In summary, I am a self-motivated worker who can and will adapt to whatever situation I am put in. I do need instructions before most new tasks to clearly understand what I have to do of course, though once I get started often times I get things done quicker than expected. Working hard and quickly is what I do best, so the longer I am with your company/in my position the better I can pull this off by a large amount.

Education

In the college courses I have taken to get my diploma, through fall 2021 to now (two-year program, 24 courses (52 instructional hours each on average) mistakes were made at first but I kept going anyway and finished it eventually) I have gotten some good experience with many different fields in computer programming, though I wouldn't say I've mastered any yet. In time I will with work experience, that I know. Angular, C#, C, HTML, (some) AWS, Python, databases (mySQL especially but I can pick up other languages as other platforms are similar), a brief look into systems analysis and project management, Java/JS, and more are all things I've picked up some knowledge on. The specific one I want to gain more experience with and truly learn hasn't been decided yet but I am mostly considering database work as it seems like a good fit for me, though starting off with IT support may be best as something to begin with. If you're reading this as a resume application to a job in that field that's likely why.

Experience

My work experience is quite low as I am only 21 and have focused on my schooling for the past two years as well as some other personal matters, but what I do have is this:

-A few years experience helping with invoices for my father's contracting company. (Manalco, Velid Contracting)

-A quarter of a year's experience working in a warehouse at Best Buy, while this may sound unimpressive this is in fact related to my top point. Whenever I wasn't sick, I was known to often push through and find ideal ways/methods to complete tasks, and as well as that I wasn't easily distracted/didn't waste much time. I keep to myself often, but I entertain myself with my hilariously vivid imagination so I can keep at even the most simple tasks for as long as I need to without losing motivation. If the job has to be done it has to be done, and I'll do my best.

The reason I stopped after a quarter of a year is due to my academic probation period for my college courses ending that winter, so after this job I could continue my courses with a newfound motivation and drive to get things done.

If this resume seems strangely formatted, that is intentionally so, it reflects who I am more than a generated, copied, or idealized one. My end goal is to have 25,000 or more saved by August or September of this year due to an upcoming family event in another country, and so I may start a life of my own, on my own terms. That will be all, thank you for reading, and I hope to speak with you or one of your associates again.
